

Mixed Media:

My exploration with mixed media is driven by a need to create works without illusory space. Some of my materials are vintage fabric scraps, saved or found "trash", burlap, paper, twine and twigs. The emphasis of these pieces is primarily on the physicality of materials rather than traditional artist "mark-making" or gestural painting. The process and unexpected outcomes are more interesting to me than driving the result toward aesthetic appeal, although I do not reject that appeal. There is a literal marginality to these works in that they hang on the wall like a picture, but act more like an object because the work continues on the sides of the support and often protrudes from the surface. I embrace many of the concepts found in the anti-art movement and reject craft-like perfection and slickness, preferring humble, clumsy or abject results.

Paintings:

My paintings employ an additive and subtractive painting technique that create layered "maps," which can be read across the uppermost surface or down through the painting's layers, often seen through the wiped off parts of each layer for the pathways. I like to think of these layers as the co-mingling of the past and the present in our experience of life. The subtractive wiped areas and the transparent areas, which simultaneously reveal and conceal previous layers, expose the past. The solid and transparent areas and lines which block previous layers and assert the most recent activity are the present. This is the way we live our lives - with past experiences enriching the present and the present experiences reinterpreting the past.
